

livingtogether &

Inheritance Tax

Matthew was devastated when Alina died

“ We knew it was going to happen, she had been diagnosed with cancer the year before. She was a very practical woman and she made sure her will was up-to-date, and re-filed all her papers so that I would be able to find everything.

We tried to prepare ourselves for what would happen. She told me what she wanted me to do after she had died. She even wrote out what songs she wanted at her funeral. It may sound a bit cold but it wasn't, it was just her way of coping and of trying to help me cope.

When I started trying to sort out her affairs, I was shocked. Before I can even start, I have to pay a huge Inheritance Tax bill. I don't know how I can find the money. I don't want to have to sell our home. We've been here for 16 years and we spent so long decorating and making it ours. It's where all my best memories are, and it's our children's home. ”

Contents

Is it something I need to worry about? _	2
How does Inheritance Tax work? _____	2
Basic planning _____	5
The problem of the family home _____	7
Are trusts the answer? _____	9
How to find an adviser _____	10
Further information _____	10
Jargon buster _____	11

Introduction

Inheritance tax is no longer just a problem for the filthy-rich: after years of rising house prices (even with the recent declines) and now a five-year freeze in the tax-free allowance, more and more ordinary people are finding themselves landed with a bill.

It is particularly a problem for cohabiting couples, especially if they own their own home. Unlike married couples or civil partners, couples that live together potentially have to pay tax on anything that they inherit from each other and cannot use each other's inheritance tax allowance. This means they are also more likely to pay tax on anything they leave to other people, such as their children or family members.

In this guide, we'll show you how Inheritance Tax works, how it is charged, and what action you can take to avoid leaving your partner with a whacking great Inheritance Tax bill to remember you by.

Is it something I need to worry about?

It may be. Inheritance Tax is charged on any estate worth over £325,000 (for 2010–11 and frozen at this level until 5 April 2015). This is the 'nil rate band'. Add up everything you own, including your share of the things you own jointly with your partner, and subtract everything that you owe, including your mortgage and things like loans, credit card bills, etc. If what's left comes to over £325,000 you do need to be thinking about it.

How bad is it?

It's fair to say it can be a pretty painful bill to land on your doormat. When you die, anything over the nil rate band gets taxed at a rate of 40%. This can take a significant bite out of the amount you leave, which is not so bad if you're leaving your money to a grown-up child or friend; but if it's your partner, it can have drastic effects. It can sometimes mean they have to sell the home you've made together.

The good news is that, with a little tax planning, you can reduce the amount or even avoid a bill altogether.

How does Inheritance Tax work?

Inheritance Tax taxes the things of value you leave behind when you die. People you have given things to can also be charged Inheritance Tax on gifts you made during the last seven years of your life.

When you die the value of the things you own are added up and any debts are deducted. Any gifts you have made in the last seven years that are not tax-free are added to the sum.

The nil-rate band is set against this total and used up against the earlier gifts before the later. Your estate is treated as the last gift you make. Inheritance tax then has to be paid on any part of the estate that is not covered by the nil rate band (£325,000 for 2010–11).

Inheritance Tax has to be paid before your money and belongings can be distributed to the people in your will.

Remember, you really need to make a will. Without one, your partner will not automatically inherit anything from you. See our Wills leaflet for more details.

Bill and Sarah

Bill and Sarah lived together for 14 years. The house was in Bill's name but he'd left it to Sarah in his will. When he died in November 2007, the house was valued at £320,000.

Two years before he died his sister had run into money problems and he'd given her a lump sum to sort out all her debts. This had to be taken into account in Bill's estate and, along with a bit of savings and his car, brought the total up to £343,000.

The first £300,000 (the nil-rate band for 2007–8) was not taxed. But the remaining £43,000 was taxed at the rate of 40%. Sarah was left with an Inheritance Tax bill of £17,200. At 2010–11 rates, the amount of tax payable would still be substantial: the first £325,000 (the nil-rate band now) is not taxed, but the remaining £18,000 is taxed at 40%, which means tax of £7,200.

Exemptions

There are, however, a number of ways that you can give money to friends or family members, either in your lifetime or when you die, without having to pay Inheritance Tax on it.

Things you give away more than seven years before you die

Most gifts to people you make while you are alive are treated as being exempt from Inheritance Tax (what tax advisers call 'potentially exempt transfers' or PETs). But, if you die within seven years of making any gifts, they are reassessed as if they had been taxable after all. This may push up the tax bill on the things you leave when you die. If you don't die within seven years, you're home free.

If you do die within seven years, the people you gave those gifts to might also have to pay Inheritance Tax on them. But they will have less tax to pay if you died between three and seven years after giving the gift than if you died sooner after giving the gift. If they cannot or will not pay, the estate will have to pay instead.

Wow - thanks Dad - now don't die for seven years!

ALL GIFTS MAY BE LIABLE TO INHERITANCE TAX...

Other exemptions

There are also ways you can give money and property away without being subject to Inheritance Tax, even if you die tomorrow. The main ones are:

- Anything you give to your husband, wife, or civil partner. This is where unmarried couples really lose out and why Inheritance Tax planning is particularly important. Some couples even consider getting married for this reason.
- The first £3,000 of gifts you make in each tax year. If you didn't use all of this allowance last year, you can use it this year too. It can't be carried over for more than one year.
- Small gifts of £250 or less. These are always exempt as long as the total you've given to any one person in any year is £250 or less (this cannot be combined with any gifts you made under the exemption above).
- Gifts to family and friends when they get married or enter a civil partnership – £5,000 is exempt if it is your child getting married/civil partnered, £2,500 if it is your grandchild, and £1,000 for anybody else.
- Gifts for the upkeep of your family, including for example, your children, husband, wife, civil partner, or ex-husband/wife/civil partner, but not an unmarried partner.

- All gifts to UK-established charities, housing associations, or amateur sports clubs.
- Gifts to political parties (generally those represented in parliament with at least 2 MPs).
- The gifts you make out of your income on a regular basis. For example, if you pay maintenance to a former unmarried partner, or if you give your brother £100 every month, that won't be counted. It can also include premiums for life insurance that will benefit someone else. These payments have to be out of your income, not from your savings.

The spouse, charity, and political party exemptions are also available when you die. This means you don't have to give your money away now, you could do it in your will.

Even if no exemptions apply, most gifts you make before you die are tax-free at the time you make them because they are either PETs or fall within the nil-rate band.

Reliefs

There are also 'reliefs' which reduce the amount of tax you have to pay on certain things:

- Business Property Relief (BPR) – if you own property, machinery or other assets used for a business, the value of them can be reduced by 50 or 100% when working out Inheritance Tax. This includes a 100% reduction in the value of gifts of unincorporated businesses and unquoted shares (which includes AIM shares), though there are some restrictions on qualifying business.
- Forestry land – might also qualify for BPR or APR. If not, the timber (but not the land) might qualify for a special woodland relief. This is a complex area – get advice.
- Agricultural Property Relief (APR) – sometimes called Farm Relief – If you own farmland that has vacant possession (or can obtain it within 24 months) the value of the land can be discounted for Inheritance Tax purposes. This also applies to farmhouses and cottages as long as they are used for agricultural purposes. The value of other let agricultural land and property can be reduced by 50%.

John's Story

"I've been living with Gillian since the early 70s and we have three children together. We never got married, partly because we didn't want the state to be involved in our personal life, and we've always been very happy with the situation. But now we have hit a problem.

Our home in north London is worth quite a lot of money. If one of us died, the other would have to pay a huge Inheritance Tax bill and might have to sell our home. We've looked into all the different ways of tax planning but, because of our particular circumstances, nothing will work for us. Our solicitor has advised us that there is only one way of avoiding an Inheritance Tax bill – getting married!

We never wanted the state to interfere in our personal affairs and I feel unhappy that it is now. However, I'm a pragmatist. I could stay firm and not get married but that would hardly keep us warm when the tax bill lands on the doormat."

Basic planning

For many people, a little Inheritance Tax planning now will substantially reduce the bill your loved ones will get when you die. Others may be able to avoid one altogether.

STEP 1

The first thing is to work out realistically how much your estate might add up to. Add up everything you own, including your share of the things you own jointly with your partner, and subtract anything you owe. You need to look at ways you can get rid of any amount over the nil rate band (£325,000 for 2010–11) but, ideally still giving your money to the people you want it to go to.

STEP 2

Think about where you want your assets to go – and make sure your will is up to date.

STEP 3

You need to get as many assets outside your estate as possible. Make sure that any death benefits – perhaps there would be some from an employer's pension or insurance scheme – are not included in the estate. You can do this by nominating who it should be paid to.

LOOK AT WAYS YOU CAN GET RID OF ANY AMOUNT OVER THE NIL BAND ...

STEP 4

Where possible, your best bet is to make use of the potentially exempt transfer rules. You could consider equalising your estate with your partner's (but unmarried couples need to watch out for other taxes, such as capital gains tax, when making gifts to each other), or giving your heirs some of the money now. Remember that if you die within seven years, these gifts will be counted as part of your estate for Inheritance Tax purposes unless they count as tax-free gifts – the £3,000 annual exemption, gifts on a marriage, and expenditure out of income exemptions can let you give away some useful sums.

STEP 5

Ensure you make full use of the nil rate band that everyone has available (£325,000 for 2010–11).

George and Harriet

When he dies, George's assets add up to £340,000. He leaves it all to his partner Harriet, who has to pay £6,000 in Inheritance Tax. Harriet has assets of her own of £100,000, so when she dies their children get an Inheritance Tax bill of £43,600.

If George had left say £200,000 of his estate to his children and the rest to Harriet, there would still be £6,000 IHT on George's death, but none on Harriet's death, as her nil rate band would cover her estate. This would have saved the family £43,600 because the assets wouldn't have been "double charged". (See box on page 6.) Of course this would only be possible if George knew that Harriet would not need the assets during her lifetime.

Of course, practicalities must be the first consideration – there may be no one else that George wants to give his money to, and Harriet may need all of George's funds. In which case, it would have been a good idea to even up their estates before George died by giving Harriet some of his money. Be careful – you can be liable for Capital Gains Tax, Pre-Owned Assets Tax and/or Stamp Duty on gifts between unmarried couples. Get advice.

Double charging and double standards

Married couples and civil partners are not double charged in this way, only unmarried couples. Rather than each partner having an allowance of £325,000 each (2010–11), married couples and civil partners effectively have an allowance of £650,000 between them (2010–11). They can put off using part or all of this joint allowance until the second of them dies. Unmarried couples do not have this flexibility – if they want to make full use of their allowances, they must use each allowance at the time of each death.

STEP 6

Consider paying regularly into a life insurance policy that is written to pay out on death to your partner (not your estate), so that they will have enough to pay any Inheritance Tax bill that does occur. The premiums (which count as gifts) will be exempt from Inheritance Tax if they fall within your regular gifts out of income exemption or £3,000 annual exemption.

STEP 7

You could consider investing in business or agricultural property as well. However this can be risky. You should take expert advice.

If I die you'll have to live in a tent!

"YOU MAY HAVE TO SELL YOUR HOME"

It's not too late

If you don't manage to do any Inheritance Tax planning before your partner dies, all is not necessarily lost. You might still be able to reduce the overall Inheritance Tax bill by giving up part or all of whatever you are entitled to in favour of someone else. To do this, you'd need to enter into a 'deed of variation' (or, possibly, make a 'disclaimer') within two years of the death. You should speak to a specialist solicitor or tax adviser about this.

George and Harriet

By signing a 'deed of variation' on George's death, Harriet could have arranged for £200,000 of his estate to pass directly to their children in spite of what it said in George's will. This would have avoided the 'double charge'.

The problem of the family home

For most people, their main asset is their home. Even a fairly modest house or flat in expensive areas like London or the South East can push you over the Inheritance Tax nil rate band.

Giving your home away during your lifetime, to your children for example, is unlikely to be a cracking idea. Having security should always be your biggest concern. And although you probably trust the person you would give it to, something could happen that was beyond their control – leaving you homeless.

If you give the house away but continue living there, it will still count as yours when they tot up the Inheritance Tax bill unless you pay rent to the owner at the commercial rate (or if the new owner lives there with you, you pay at least your share of the home-related expenses). This is because it will otherwise be counted as a “gift with reservation of benefit”. If you are elderly or infirm, these rules may not apply – get specialist advice.

Do you own your home in one person’s name?

If you do, then, depending on what else you each own, you might want to think about putting it into both names. You must get legal and financial advice about this however, as you would essentially be giving half of your house to your partner, which would be a real problem if you split up.

If you do pass half your home to your partner, you would not normally have to pay any Capital Gains Tax because it is his or her main home. But there may be Stamp Duty Land Tax to pay.

If you do this, you will need to take steps to avoid the “gift with reservation of benefit” rules. In practice, you can do this by continuing to pay your full share of the running costs of the home, and the cost of maintenance and improvements – and keep records to prove to HMRC that you did.

Do you own your home jointly?

There are two ways to own property jointly, and which you choose makes a big difference when one of you dies.

- Joint ownership – when one owner dies their share of the property automatically passes to the other joint owner (but that share still counts as part of the dead partner’s estate for tax purposes).
- Tenants in common – each joint owner has their own separate share of the property which can be left to whoever they like.

A POSSIBLE DISADVANTAGE...

Leaving half the home to someone else

Most couples tend to own their homes as joint tenants. Changing to tenants in common is sometimes a good idea as it opens up the possibility of leaving half the house to the children. However, it is important to stress that this can be a really bad plan – it could result in the family home being half-owned by your partner, and half-owned by children who have moved away. This can, and does, sometimes cause serious problems, both legal and emotional, as your children and partner could fall out, or the children could try to force a sale. It is also important to remember that, if it is not the children’s main residence, the increase in the value of their half since your death will be subject to Capital Gains Tax anyway.

To give or not to give?

Iris gave her holiday cottage in Devon to her children in January 2006. As it was her second home, not her main residence she had to pay Capital Gains Tax, even though no cash changed hands.

Sadly Iris died in December 2008. Because she died within seven years, the value of the property became taxable for Inheritance Tax purposes, so it ended up being taxed twice. Had she kept the property until she died, there would only have been Inheritance Tax to pay. There is no Capital Gains Tax on what you leave in your estate when you die.

Some people consider reducing the value of their property through various means.

If you have a mortgage, the amount you still owe will be set against the value of the home. So, for people who need more money during their lifetime, taking out a lifetime mortgage is worth looking into. (If you don't need to free up money for use during your lifetime, a lifetime mortgage is not a good bet.) Normally you don't pay any interest until you no longer need the home (i.e. when you die or move permanently into care), when you pay it all in a lump sum, along with the amount borrowed.

Another possible route is selling part or all of your home to a specialist company or insurer (this is called "home reversion"). On your death the home is sold, the company gets its share and the rest goes to your estate. The downside here is that you don't benefit from any rise in value of the part you sold.

Both types of scheme reduce the value of your estate. However, there are big drawbacks with these schemes (often called 'equity release schemes'): the cost can be so high that it wipes out any tax savings, and they are only for people aged 60/65 and older. Do not consider doing this without expert advice.

Giving your home away

There are planning schemes that try to get around the 'gift with reservation of benefit' rules, and enable the owners to seemingly give the property away and yet keep living there. These schemes are usually now hit by the "pre-owned assets" charge, which means you have to pay income tax in some circumstances. If you are contemplating something like this, you must get advice from a properly qualified tax adviser.

Are trusts the answer?

Trusts (or settlements as they are often called), are sometimes seen as the solution to all tax problems – but, if that ever was the case, it is certainly not true now.

The point of trusts is that they enable you to delay giving money or assets to the eventual owner, and allow you to have some control over how a gift is used. There are two main forms of trust, which are:

- Life interest or interest in possession – this gives someone (or a group of people) the use of the trust asset or income for life or for a defined period.
- Discretionary trust – this gives the trustees the choice as to who gets the income and capital, and when.

The most common reason for trusts is because the intended recipients are still children. In this way parents or grandparents can put money into a trust (or leave it in a will to a trust) for them. That trust can dictate that the income can be used for the children's upkeep and otherwise saved and paid out, together with the capital, when the children reach a certain age.

I decided on a discretionary trust because it gives me control over capital

Trusts and tax can get quite complicated, and you should get advice on all the implications as both types of trust can be hit by Inheritance Tax, Income Tax, and Capital Gains Tax. Speak to a specialist. You will need a solicitor to set up a trust.

Do you own assets abroad?

Many other countries have some form of death duties, so if you have assets in more than one country you need to look into the possible impact of all sets of tax rules. Many countries also have rules about who can or must inherit from you. Get advice from a tax adviser.

Is your main home outside the UK?

Or are you planning on retiring to the sun?

You may still face a UK inheritance tax bill on all of your assets (whether those assets are based in the UK or abroad) if this is your home country or you have lived in the UK for 17 out of the last 20 tax years. The rules are complicated so, if you are in this position, you should seek advice.

How to find an adviser

You can get advice on Inheritance Tax planning from a tax adviser or an accountant who specialises in tax. However, you do need to be careful when choosing as anyone can set themselves up as a tax adviser or accountant, even if they have no qualifications or experience. Make sure you choose someone who belongs to a professional institute which requires them to have been trained and taken exams, have professional indemnity insurance, and have a complaints procedure. The two institutes on the right can tell you if an accountant or tax adviser is one of their members, but they cannot recommend one adviser over another.

- The Chartered Institute of Taxation can provide you with a list of tax advisers in your local area. Call 020 7340 0550 or 0844 579 6700 or search for their members online at www.tax.org.uk
- Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales. Search for their members online at www.icaew.co.uk or call 020 7920 8100.
- Society of Trust and Estate Practitioners. Search for members online at www.step.org or call 020 7340 0500.

If you are thinking of setting up a trust or writing a will, you need to see a solicitor.

- The Law Society. Search for their members online at www.lawsociety.org.uk

TO BE HONEST I THINK YOU'D BE BETTER OFF SPEAKING TO SOMEONE WHO BELONGS TO A PROFESSIONAL INSTITUTE

Further information

HMRC

www.hmrc.gov.uk

Low Incomes Tax Reform Group

www.litr.org.uk

Which? Essential Guide – 'Giving and inheriting'

by Jonquil Lowe.

You can buy it online at www.which.co.uk

Jargon buster

The jargon	What it means
Assets	Things of value (house, savings, shares, car, antique gold necklaces, etc.) that you own.
Beneficiary	Someone who gets something from your estate.
Capital Gains Tax	A type of tax that you have to pay when you sell or give away an asset that has increased in value while you have owned it. It does not apply to gifts of cash or (usually) the sale of your own home. See 'Further information' on page 10.
Domicile	The country where the law treats you as having your real home. See page 9.
Estate	All the assets that you own when you die, minus all the debts you owe and other expenses such as funeral costs.
Executor	The person you appoint in your will to sort out your estate.
Exemptions	The ways you can give money to particular people without having to pay Inheritance Tax on it.
Gift with reservation of benefit	Something that you give away, but continue to have the right to use yourself. Anything deemed a 'gift with reservation of benefit' will still be seen as part of your estate when you die. (The person you give it to may also have to pay Capital Gains Tax when they sell it or give it away.)
Intestate	Dying without having made a will. See our Wills & Living Together guide.
Nil rate band	This is the amount below which no Inheritance Tax is charged. In tax year 2010–11 it is £325,000.
Pre-owned assets tax	Yearly income tax on the benefit you are deemed to get from things you give away but still retain the benefit of – for example, a house that you continue living in.
Potentially exempt transfer (PET)	Gifts you make during your lifetime that become tax-free if you don't die for seven years. See page 3.

(continued)

(continued)

The jargon	What it means
Probate	The legal ability of the executors of your will to distribute your estate.
Reliefs	Rules which reduce the amount of tax you have to pay. The full value of certain assets is not counted.
Taper relief	This reduces the amount of Inheritance Tax the recipient has to pay on a gift you made to them between three and seven years before your death.
Transfers of value	Things of value that you give to somebody else; gifts.
Trusts	Property held by one person, or a group, for the benefit of another. For more about trusts see page 9.

THREE THINGS THAT DON'T EXIST.

1. LOCH NESS MONSTER

2. CATS' NINE LIVES

3. COMMON LAW MARRIAGE

This leaflet is one of a series produced by Advicenow's LivingTogether campaign. Other titles in the series include:

- Living Together Agreements
- Housing & LivingTogether
- Wills & LivingTogether
- Pensions & LivingTogether
- Benefits & LivingTogether
- What about the kids?
- How to get Parental Responsibility for your partner's children
- Breaking up checklist

The LivingTogether Campaign applies to England and Wales only. The law in Scotland and Northern Ireland is significantly different.

The law is complicated and everyone's situation is different. Always get advice.

The LivingTogether campaign aims to increase awareness and understanding of the legal issues around living together. We explain exactly what rights couples living together really have, and show you practical ways you can protect yourself and your partner.

advice
services
alliance

ONE
PLUS
ONE

The LivingTogether campaign is led by Advice Services Alliance in partnership with One Plus One (www.oneplusone.org.uk) and is funded by the Ministry of Justice.

Advice Services Alliance (ASA) is the co-ordinating body for UK advice services. ASA members include AdviceUK, Age UK, Citizens Advice, DIAL UK, Law Centres Federation, Shelter and Youth Access. ASA works with its membership and government to develop policy on delivery of legal and advice services; champions the development of high quality information, advice and legal services; and provides supporting services to advice networks.

Written by Mary Webber. With thanks to John Whiting, Tax Partner at PricewaterhouseCoopers, Jonquil Lowe, and The Low Income Tax Reform Group, for their assistance. Updated May 2010.

Published by Advice Services Alliance, 6th Floor, 63 St Mary Axe, London EC3A 8AA.

The Advice Services Alliance is a company limited by guarantee, registered in England and Wales no. 3533317. Charity no. 1112627. Registered office: 6th Floor, 63 St Mary Axe, London EC3A 8AA.